To Whom it May Concern,

Sarah Hammon applied to our internship program in the summer of 2012. She was ultimately selected because of her desire to get into the gaming industry.

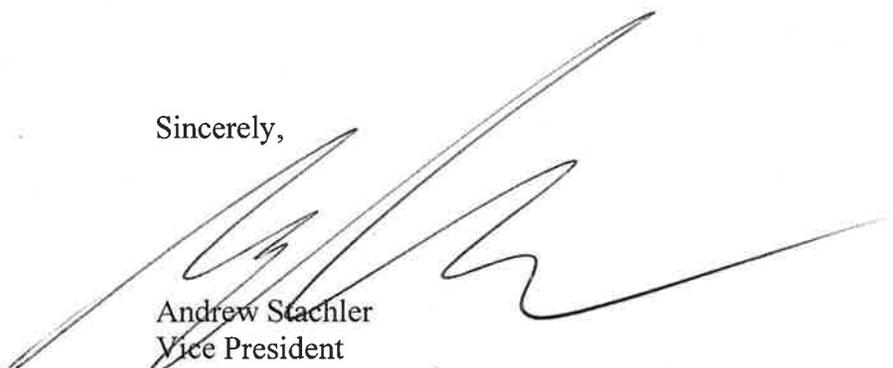

Sarah did excellent work supporting our Interactive Department as well as our vendors. She designed online ads and websites, but her best contribution was the detailed QA testing of our promotional websites, apps and games. She discovered problems and communicated potential solutions in an effort to make them a more fun and engaging experience.

Our game developers determined that the Dark Knight Rises game would have been better had Sarah been in on the project from the start. She went on to create an impressive tutorial video and interactive manual for the game. We used many of her game concepts in the Man of Steel online games. Besides designing and concept development, Sarah possesses excellent writing skills. She wrote dialogue for Ellen McClain's Jaeger A.I. role in the Pacific Rim online game.

We brought Sarah back for a rare second internship in the Spring of 2013. We considered hiring Sarah in for a third internship, however the UC internship program recommended against this in order for the student to have a well-rounded experience. We offered Sarah freelancing work following this internship, but respected that her full time school schedule would not allow it.

We here at Warner Bros. highly recommend Sarah Hammon. She is a pleasure to work with and has a great work ethic. We wish her the very best of luck in future endeavors.

Sincerely,

To whom it may concern:

It is my pleasure to write a letter of recommendation for Sarah Hammon. I am the Program and Events Manager at the Corporation for Findlay Market (CFFM) and I had the honor of being Sarah's supervisor during her co-op during the Winter Semester of 2013.

Sarah received her Bachelor's Degree in Graphic Communication Design and she was an integral part of many designs for Findlay Market. Findlay Market is Ohio's oldest running public market and the 4th most visited place in Cincinnati. The market sees an estimated 1 million visitors per year.

During her time with CFFM, Sarah was the only designer on staff, so she was responsible for all promotional and marketing materials that the public would see. Many co-op experiences at other places tend to be that the student is helping another designer or even doing some of the grunt work. Not at Findlay. At Findlay, Sarah had the huge responsibility to ensure that all graphic collateral meant to bring in more shoppers, more dollars and more resources aligned with our mission, aligned with our brand and was also exciting and eye-catching.

Sarah did a little bit of everything at Findlay Market, from designing window decals to social media graphics to new market merchandise. I could go into every single thing she was responsible for and that would surely explain her design talents, but it cannot be overstated how much of a project manager she had to be, as well. In addition to the design work, Sarah was responsible for the ordering and purchasing of most of our materials. She worked directly with multiple distributors and printers across the city and across the country to ensure that we got the best price and the best product.

Aside from her talents as a graphic designer, it was clear to me that I saw Sarah grow as a person during her time at Findlay Market. The market is located in a part of Over-the-Rhine that has not seen complete redevelopment like some of the other parts of the neighborhood. It's still a little rough around the area. I knew that this was a new, and sometimes daunting, experience for Sarah. However, I saw her open up and experience new things, places and foods while here. I think that this behavior speaks volumes as far as the type of person you'd want working for you. You want someone that overcomes her fears and wants to try new things.

Sarah is a phenomenally talented designer. But I know that she's more than that, as well. She puts everything she has into her work and is someone that I can trust to always give 100%. I know that Sarah has a bright future ahead of her and I am honored to help her on that path.

Please feel free to contact me with any questions.

Sincerely,

Kelly Lanser
